Frank Frazetta's
Dark Kingdom

Dark Kingdom in the Spotlight

Frank Frazetta and comics—it seems like a natural combination, doesn't it? But it took Jay Fotos to transform the idea into reality—first with Death Dealer, which is just wrapping up its six-issue run, and next with Dark Kingdom,a one-shot based on another of Frazetta's famous paintings (this one originally done as the cover painting for the paperback version of Karl Edward Wagner's superb Kane novel Dark Crusade—a brilliantly unique heroic fantasy concept that would make a superb comic in its own right... but that's another story...).

As the mastermind behind the Frazetta books, Fotos wears many hats. "If I had to describe my part is the 'ring leader," Fotos said. I work with the Frazettas, Image Comics and all the artists involved making sure we all get things moving forward on all aspects. Along with art direction, coloring, design and prepress...wearing many hats, I call it guerrilla style, if it's something I can do, I'll do it. Everyone involved is a part of it, though, and without everyone's participation we wouldn't have what we have."

The mere mention of Frazetta's name is enough to attract the attention of some of the field's top art talents. "I don't think there's an artist out there today who isn't Frazetta influenced in one way or another," Fotos said. "Frank's work grabbed me at a very early age, My dad is a fan, I still remember seeing Frazetta's paperback covers around the house as a child. Frank Frazetta and my dad are my earliest influences in choosing art as a career."

Likewise, writers are eager to create stories inspired by Frazetta's moody, evocative paintings. How does each storyline develop? "I leave it up to the writers," Fotos said. "I asked them to pick out three of there top Frazetta paintings they would like to write a story to. From that point, we go over concept ideas and if it all gels, we do it. I just give them the rules (set by the Frazettas) and let them go, simple as that. From that point, the story goes to the Frazettas for final approval, Frank sees and approves everything."

So the esteemed Mr. Frazetta actually reads through every projects, views every piece of art before it goes to print? "Yes, Frank approves everything—nothing goes to press until he approves it. Though things move a lot smoother now: I know what he wants and what he doesn't want, so it all gets filtered before he sees it; as a result, the approval process moves pretty quickly."

AND KEEPING WITH HIS EYES, MORDEN ENTERED THE KINGDOM OF DARKNESS
SKREE! SKREE!
IN THE MONSTER'S NEST, MORDEN LEARNED THE DARK PATE OF THE VILLAGE'S CHILDREN.

Writer Mark Kidwell offered a summary of the story he's developed from Frazetta's painting. "This first look into Frazetta's Dark Kingdom is an introduction to the legend of Red Morden," Kidwell said. The writer describes Morden as "a seafaring berserker with flame red hair and dripping battle axe—his name alone means terror on the high seas. The story is set near the middle of Morden's life, at a time when everything he loves, everything that keeps him human and separate from his violent personae is endangered. It's an exploration of the limits of a man's courage and what it takes to shatter those limits to face not only demons of fang and claw, but those of the mind. As in the famous Frazetta painting, the 'Dark Kingdom' lurks behind the eyes as much as in the dark, reptilian cave before them. We'll give you a peek into the shadows of both."

Kidwell is particularly pleased that he was tapped to write this story. "I'll tell ya, that painting has spoken to me since I was a kid. I always stared at it, wondering what in the world was in that cave…and what would make someone go in there? I figured it must be an 'all or nothing' situation, where everything this armored guy had was on the line," Kidwell said. "I imagined the one thing that would send me into that dark place, then imagined what would be waiting in the shadows. From there, the story just rolled and the Red Morden character solidified as this real guy, with a life, a family, passions and fears all his own.

"Now that the character has taken his first steps, the ideas and potential for stories just won't stop. Like the Death Dealer paintings and so many other *Frank Frazetta images, it d*oesn't take much for sword and sorcery fans to start imagining endless adventures for the characters depicted. There's savage life in those paintings, man!"

Did Kidwell read any of the books that inspired the original Frazetta cover paintings? "Yes and no," the writer replied. "I didn't purposely sit down and read any of the books with Frazetta covers to get in the frame of mind to write Dark Kingdom, but I've read and re-read (too many times) all the Robert E. Howard stuff that carried the early paintings. I've been a rabid fan of heroic fantasy since I was a kid, and it shows in the work. Fans of that classic literature will see plenty of influence from Howard, Leiber, Lovecraft and even a bit of Homer's Odyssey in the book. It's impossible to write within this genre and not have the influence of those giants show."

While Dark Kingdom is a oneshot, is there a chance that readers might see more tales of the book's barbaric hero? "There's definitely more planned for Red Morden," Kidwell said. "The first story is pretty much self-contained, but leaves tons of room to spin tales that take place before and after the events of the first book. It will all depend on fan response and demand for more. I have the next three books roughed out in my head—so if the readers are ready, so are we!"

Dark Kingdom is illustrated by Tim Vigil, an artist best known for his brutal, edgy series Faust. "We are so happy to bring Tim to Frazetta Comics," Fotos said. "Tim is a vet in the industry and brings back the 'ol'school' classic look we want. His work thus far on the book is incredible and we're already anticipating a Dark Kingdom Part 2, knowing this book will blow people's minds and they'll want more!"

While Vigil has been out of the spotlight in recent years, he's remained active in comics. "I've been doing odd ball stuff and my own book Faust (two issues left!), all in the independent market, where it doesn't get any attention. I've also been working on paintings," Vigil said. "And I do conventions to try to keep my name out in the public."

How did the artist become involved in Dark Kingdom? "Last year I ran into Jay Fotos at a con in Arizona and we got to talking. He was promoting Death Dealer—issue one hadn't come out at that time—and I offered to do a pin-up for the comic, and he accepted," Vigil said. "From there, we started talking, and he asked me if I would be interested in the book—and of course, I jumped at the chance! It was a project that I really wanted to contribute to. The Frazetta influence is something that deserves attention, so I'm glad it all worked out."

Like many fans, Vigil's first exposure to Frazetta's work came via "his Conan covers and his Warren magazine covers," Vigil said. "The Conan stuff was heavily influential on what I wanted to do as an illustrator, and has stayed with me to this day. He imbedded in me a strong love of sword and sorcery."

While Vigil wants to pay homage to Frazetta's vitality and imagery, he isn't sacrificing his own artistic style in an attempt to imitate Frazetta's. " I have my own style of storytelling, as does the writer Mark Kidwell, but I was always very conscious of the name Frazetta and his influence as I did this project," Vigil said. "I try to capture strength and primal emotion that he shows so well with his work."

Did Fotos anticipate the success his Frazetta projects would find in today's comics marketplace? He must have been thrilled with multiple sellouts and reprintings of Death Dealer. "Thrilled? More like shocked!" Fotos joked. "I had no idea what to expect; I knew we would do OK, I knew all the ol' school Frazetta fans would come out of the woodwork—but we didn't expect the reaction we got. I think we were most thrilled about being able to work with Frazetta and take such an iconic painting/artist and bring it into another medium, rather than trying to make a buck."

Is Fotos preparing an entire line of Frazetta books beyond Dark Kingdom? "Yes. The success of Death Dealer gave us the platform to grow and establish the 'brand name' of Frazetta Comics. We are still at the foundation stage with Frazetta Comics, building that relationship with the fans and retailers is very important to me. So we are going to take it slow—well, is five new Frazetta titles this year taking it slow?

"First out the gate, obviously, is Frank Frazetta's Dark Kingdom, which should reach comic shops in April. Also in April we have the Death Dealer Complete Collection Deluxe Hardcover, I'm so excited by this one—it's an oversized (8.5" x 12.5") slipcased hardcover stuffed with a ton of extras—a big hunky book, I love it!" Fotos said.

Frank Frazetta's Dark Kingdom, a $3.99 oneshot by Mark Kidwell, Tim Vigil, & Jay Fotos scheduled for April 2nd release, will be offered with variant covers by Frazetta, Vigil, and Nat Jones. The Death Dealer Deluxe Hardcover, a $49.99 slipcased volume, follows a few weeks later.
